Church Attendants Walk from Elmville.
The widespread interest in the mission being conducted at St. James' church by Rev. P. F. McCarthy, S. J., this week is indicated by the fact that some of the residents of Elmville who are attending the early morning service have been getting up at 3 a. m. and walking to Danielson, as there is no car service at that hour. More than ordinary devotion marked the Holy Thursday services at the church. Selections of the town have posted throughout Killingly the usual notices relative to the payment of taxes on dogs, due on or before May 1. Persons who delay paying until after that date being subject to an extra assessment.

Agents Barred from Schools.

The adoption of the rule is the direct result of the visit of a man who gained admittance to various schools in town through falsely representing himself as a "state inspector," of just what is not clear, and this after he had been refused permission to solicit business in the schools.

SWAM RIVER TWICE.

Ovid Boulay Made Desperate Effort to Escape From Captain John Murray—Captured at Last.

Thursday was not just the kind of a day that most people would live in. In Putnam would pick out for open water bathing, but Ovid Boulay who has just been released from Brooklyn jail, made his season's inaugural plunge into the Quabaug river and put up one of the stiffest swimming exhibitions that has been seen in this vicinity for some time—not because he is an ice water swimming enthusiast, but on account of his preference to doing the stunt rather than to fall into the hands of Captain John Murray, who was seeking to arrest him. After having received complaint from Mrs. Boulay that her husband had been raising rackets at their home, Boulay had succeeded in eluding two officers who were after him in New York city, and probably felt so good over it that he was willing to take any kind of a chance. Perhaps he does not like to be such a constant guest at Brooklyn.

At any rate, when Captain Murray got after him Thursday afternoon Boulay made a dash for the river bank, on the northern section of the mills in the northern section of the city. Without waiting to remove any clothing Boulay plunged into the icy water and started his swim for the opposite shore, approximately 125 yards distant in a direct line, but the current runs strong and fast at the point where Boulay dove in and it carried him down stream so he probably swam twice the distance of the river before he made the landing on the east side.

Captain Murray stood on the bank watching with appreciative eyes the swim that Boulay was making and noted the latter's landing across the way. The river was so fast that he got his man, and the captain is a real getter. Getting into an automobile the officer hurried down this side of the river and across the bridge and through streets that led him to a quarry—was within a few feet of him, in fact—when Boulay discovered the captain's presence and started on the run.

Handcuffed as he was, Boulay outran the officer, but to make his getaway sure he again plunged into the river and started to swim back to the west shore. When he was midway out in the stream Captain Murray yelled to him that he would get him if he took the remainder of the day, but Boulay raised his hand to his nose and wriggled his fingers. Then he yelled back to the captain: "If I drown, you'll be to blame for it," all of which made the captain very sad—perhaps! Boulay again made a magnificent swim and landed shivering but free.

In the wake of the proceedings Captain Murray adopted new tactics. He got to a telephone and sent a message down to Sheriff Holtbrook to get some men on Boulay's trail. The idea was that he would run so quickly if he didn't get a glimpse of a uniform. Eugene Papparle was one of those who responded and after traveling along the west river bank, he spied Boulay huddled up in a clump of bushes, his coat thrown over his head. He was dragged out and taken into custody by Papparle, who later turned him over to Captain Murray. He was hurried to the police station, stripped of his dripping clothing, and wrapped in blankets and placed in a cell. A hot drink helped to stop his teeth from chattering.

Boulay is an old offender. He never quite if there is a chance to get away and twice after he was captured by Laparle he tried to break away and get into the river, where he seems to be as much at home as a fish. Those who saw his swimming performance characterized it as a crackerjack under the conditions. Most men who might try it under conditions that Boulay faced would be in line for an obituary notice.
